To the Editor: In answer to inquiry of E. De Puy: "Wherein the new geometry differs from the old, and to what is its popular excellence." I beg to say The new geometry is simply programive evolution of the old. List the methods of treating geometric subjects differ widely from the old to consequence of certain lately discovered principles and dements which enable us to prove to practice what we teach as theory, by simply using comsurational arithmetic instead of abstruce algebraic calculus which givers begins and terminates with an inexplicable x, a plus or a minus.

The newly discovered elements are: A B, hord, subtending the arc A X B equal to 2-7 cirnumberence. This chord is as long as the quadrant erc A N C when rectified or straigtened out. A D is a chord, subtending the arc A X C D equal to $-17 circumference. This chord equals the side of a mean-proportional square between diameter squared and another square the perimeter of which equals the circle's circumference. A H a chord, subtending the arc A Y H equal to circumference. This chord equals the edge of a cute equal in volume to the volume of a sphere constructed over the given circle. The discovery of these three lines revolutionizes mathematical methods and will in reasonable timmake geometry as popular and more profitable than are the Varsitles' football games and row-tog matches.
